RE: DUAL OFFICE-HOLDING – SPECIAL OFFICERS FOR CARRIERS – RAILROADS – RESERVE OFFICERS – LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS – special officer for railroad simultaneously serving as reserve officer without pay for local law enforcement agency. Art. II, s. 5(a), Fla. Const.; Ch. 354, Fla. Stat.

Dear Mr. Gingo:

On behalf of your client, Mr. Clifford Webster, you have asked for my opinion on substantially the following question:

Whether a special officer for a carrier under Chapter 354, Florida Statutes, may serve simultaneously as an unpaid reserve deputy sheriff without violating the Florida constitutional prohibition against dual office-holding?

In sum:

A special officer for a carrier under Chapter 354, Florida Statutes, may serve simultaneously as an unpaid reserve deputy sheriff without violating the Florida constitutional prohibition against dual office-holding expressed in Article II, section 5(a), Florida Constitution.

According to your letter, Mr. Webster has been a Brevard County deputy sheriff for the past 17 years and recently left the sheriff's office to take a position as a special officer for the Florida East Coast Railway Police Department. As described in section 354.01, Florida Statutes, Mr. Webster is a special officer for a carrier appointed by the Governor. Mr. Webster is considering volunteering his time with a local law enforcement agency as a reserve officer without remuneration, but is concerned that the Florida constitutional prohibition against dual office-holding could preclude his service in both positions. You have asked for my assistance in determining whether Mr. Webster may lawfully serve simultaneously in both capacities.

Chapter 354, Florida Statutes, provides for the appointment of special officers employed by railroads and other common carriers for the protection of the carrier's employees, passengers, freight, equipment, and properties.[1] Appointments of special officers for carriers are made by the Governor, and applicants are required to meet specified law enforcement qualifications.[2] While special officers are required to meet the standards of a certified law enforcement officer in order to be commissioned, certification is not granted to these officers.[3] Section 354.02, Florida Statutes, provides for the powers of such special officers:

"Each special officer shall have and exercise throughout every county in which the common carrier for which he or she was appointed, shall do business, operate, or own property, the power to make arrests for violation of law on the property of such common carrier, and to arrest persons, whether on or off such carrier's property, violating any law on such carrier's property, under the same conditions under which deputy sheriffs may by law make arrests, and shall have authority to carry weapons for the reasonable purpose of their offices."

These officers are required to provide a surety bond to the Governor for the faithful performance of their duties.[4] The statutes prescribe a term of office for special officers and they may be removed by the Governor at any time.[5] Compensation for special officers is paid by the carrier and they receive no fees or salary from the state or any county.[6] Your question requires a determination of whether this position constitutes an "office" for purposes of Florida's dual office-holding prohibition.

Article II, section 5(a) of the Florida Constitution, provides in pertinent part:

"No person shall hold at the same time more than one office under the government of the state and the counties and municipalities therein, except that a notary public or military officer may hold another office, and any officer may be a member of a constitution revision commission, taxation and budget reform commission, constitutional convention, or statutory body having only advisory powers."

This constitutional provision prohibits a person from simultaneously serving in more than one "office" under the governments of the state, counties, or municipalities. This office has concluded that the constitutional prohibition applies to both elected and appointed offices.[7] While the Constitution does not define the term "office," the courts have stated that the term "implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power . . . [and] embraces the idea of tenure, duration, and duties in exercising some portion of the sovereign power, conferred or defined by law and not by contract." [8]

This office and the courts have long recognized that law enforcement officers are "officers" subject to the constitutional dual office-holding prohibition.[9] The Florida Supreme Court has said:

"It can hardly be questioned that a patrolman on a city police force is clothed with sovereign power of the city while discharging his duty. . . . True, he is an employee of the city but he is also an officer. It is the character of duty performed that must determine his status." [10]

It is the powers that a law enforcement officer may exercise, particularly the authority to arrest without a warrant and to carry firearms in carrying out his duties, not the salary or certification requirements, that characterize the law enforcement officer as an "officer." [11] Based on these considerations, this office has stated that a certified reserve police officer is an "officer" for purposes of section 5(a), Article II, Florida Constitution.[12]

However, the Supreme Court of Florida has recognized a limited exception to the constitutional dual office-holding prohibition in Vinales v. State,[13] which concerned the appointment of municipal police officers as state attorney investigators pursuant to statute. Since the police officers' appointment was temporary and no additional remuneration was paid for performing the additional criminal investigative duties, the Court held that the officers were not simultaneously holding two offices and thus the constitutional dual office-holding prohibition did not apply. The Second District Court of Appeal in Rampil v. State,[14] following the Vinales exception, concluded that it was not a violation of Article II, section 5(a), Florida Constitution, for a city police officer to act in the capacity of deputy sheriff since that officer received no remuneration for such duties.

The exception articulated in Vinales and Rampil has been applied only when both offices have related to criminal investigation or prosecution and not to the exercise of governmental power or performance of official duties on a disparate board or position. Thus, this office, in considering the Vinales and Rampil exception, has stated that the exception is limited and does not apply to a member of a municipal board of adjustment serving as a part-time law enforcement officer or to a police officer who serves as a law enforcement officer.[15] Likewise, in Attorney General Opinion 2006-27, this office concluded that the exception to dual office-holding recognized by the courts in Vinales and Rampil does not permit the police chief to serve as acting city manager without resigning his or her office.

Based upon the powers extended to special officers for carriers, I conclude that these officers would come within the scope of the term "officers" for purposes of Florida's constitutional prohibition against dual office-holding, i.e., they are commissioned by the Governor, serve terms of office, have powers of arrest, and carry firearms. However, based on the exception recognized in the Vinales case for law enforcement officers performing additional law enforcement duties without remuneration, it is my opinion that Mr. Webster may simultaneously serve as a special officer and volunteer his time with a local law enforcement agency as an unpaid reserve officer without violating Article II, section 5(a) of the Florida Constitution.[16]

In sum, it is my opinion that a special officer for a carrier under Chapter 354, Florida Statutes, may serve simultaneously as an unpaid reserve deputy sheriff without violating the Florida constitutional prohibition against dual office-holding expressed in Article II, section 5(a), Florida Constitution.

Sincerely,

Pam Bondi
Attorney General
